The Caddo Sheriff's Regional Training Academy has graduated 1,195 law enforcement officers from its basic training course over the past 20 years. Thousands more have attended the Academy for job retraining and refresher courses.

"When we opened, I said that peace officers begin to develop their disposition toward policing on the first day they walk into the classroom. I still believe that to be true," Sheriff Prator said. "It is an awesome responsibility that our Academy staff has, and I couldn't be prouder of the quality of training they provide."

The Louisiana Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST) Council in Baton Rouge approved the opening of the Caddo Sheriff's Regional Training Academy allowing CPSO to provide state-required basic training for its recruits and those from other agencies in the 10-parish region. Since then the Academy has trained deputies and officers from 61 law enforcement agencies.

Becoming a regional Academy was no easy task. POST officials inspected the Caddo facility's guidelines, curriculum, building, and instructors' credentials before making the designation. Lesson plans for the 320-hour basic curriculum were written from scratch. District attorneys, federal prosecutors, and other legal minds were recruited to teach the law.

Over the years, and at the urging of Sheriff Prator who served on the Louisiana Peace Officer Standards and Training Council, the curriculum for all new officers in the state grew to more than 600 hours. Training now includes courses such as crisis intervention, diversity in the community, and de-escalation.
